The Center for Access to Justice presents Bridges, a forum for academics working on access to justice to connect with those doing the work on the ground. Join us for coffee, conversation and an opportunity to discuss research ideas or works in progress with scholars from other disciplines and practitioners — whether social workers, legal aid lawyers, public defenders, community organizers, or others engaged in access to justice work outside the academic context.

Attendees will be invited to present an access-to-justice research idea or work in progress and receive feedback from relevant practitioners and an interdisciplinary group of scholars.

About the Center

The Center for Access to Justice supports those working to ensure meaningful access to the courts and equal treatment in the civil and criminal justice systems, with a regional focus on the South. To that end, the center convenes stakeholders, engages in research and public education and trains the next generation of lawyers to serve the public interest.

Interested?

Send a brief description of your research proposal or an abstract from a work in progress to lawa2j@gsu.edu. To attend as a commenter, send a brief description of your area of expertise, so we can pair you with relevant presenters. Submissions will be considered on a rolling basis for the fall 2017 and spring 2018 Bridges sessions.